As the strangers talk, they begin to realize that they have more in common than they thought. They all have experienced pain and suffering in their lives. They all have made mistakes. And they all long for connection and understanding.

The play reaches its climax when one of the strangers, a woman named Sarah, tells the others about her son. Sarah's son was born with a severe disability, and he has spent his entire life in pain. Sarah has devoted her life to caring for her son, but she is exhausted and resentful. She tells the others that she sometimes wishes that her son had never been born.

The other strangers are shocked and horrified by Sarah's confession. They cannot understand how she could ever wish that her son was dead. But Sarah's confession forces them to confront their own prejudices and beliefs about suffering.

The play ends with the strangers leaving the waiting room and going their separate ways. They have all been changed by their experience, and they have a new understanding of the power of empathy and compassion.
