History of The Usual Ten Minute Play

The Usual Ten Minute Play emerged in the early 2000s as a response to the growing popularity of short-form theater. Short-form theater, which includes improv, sketch comedy, and one-act plays, has become increasingly popular due to its accessibility and affordability. The Usual Ten Minute Play takes this concept one step further by focusing on plays that are specifically written to be ten minutes or less in length.

One of the pioneers of The Usual Ten Minute Play is playwright Jonathan Turner. In 2001, Turner founded the New York City-based theater company The Flea, which has become a hub for the development and production of short plays. Turner has also written and directed numerous Ten Minute Plays, including the critically acclaimed "The Amish Project" and "The Refugee Project."

Format of The Usual Ten Minute Play

The Usual Ten Minute Play is typically performed in a black box theater, which is a small, intimate space with a flexible seating arrangement. This type of theater allows for a more immersive and interactive experience for the audience.

Ten Minute Plays are typically written with a small cast of characters and a simple set design. This allows for quick and easy transitions between plays. The plays often explore a single theme or idea, and they are often written in a nonlinear or experimental style.
